

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The revision of an unabridged dictionary cannot be a job for one or two people alone. In addition to the two new editors-in chief, several colleagues contributed to making the fourth edition a considerably revised version of the third. Thanks are due to all who participated, in whatever capacity, in this huge, multifaceted, and hectic job.

We are thankful to our bilingual consultants for reading the present edition and making several thousand suggestions, comments, and observations, which can only be made by native speakers of English.

We are grateful to our editors, who, literally turning day into night in the course of their work, collected, edited and put into the computer all the new materials with which the dictionary was enlarged. Without their devoted work, this dictionary could not have been completed by the deadline.

Our thanks go to our specialist consultants who successfully negotiated not only the difficulties presented by the special jargon of their fields but also the incredibly tight schedule with which they were asked to work.

Tamás Magay, who was one of the two editors of the 1963 and 1969 editions, unselfishly gave us his advice and help. We thank him for this.
